Safety Sense

SAFETY CHECK YOUR WINDSHIELD WASHER

Visibility is crucial to driving safety. But, of all the safety items on an automobile, probably the most overlooked is the windshield washer system. Few persons realize it needs periodic maintenance to assure it will be working when needed. Experts at ANCO, the nation's leading manufacturer of wiper blades and other windshield cleaning items, offer the following tips for maintaining your windshield washer system.

To begin, check the fluid level in the reservoir. If it's low, replace it with a bug-removing solvent in the summer, or an antifreeze solvent in the winter.

Check the aim of the spray to make sure it covers the area being cleaned. If the spray is too high, or too low, carefully bend the spray nozzles into proper position.

Sometimes there may be no spray at all because the fluid hoses are clogged. Check the hoses by removing them from the ends of the spray nozzles, or trace them to the windshield washer pump and pull them off the ends of the pump. Then try to blow through them. If the air can't get through, try to free the clog by pushing a thin wire through the ends. Reinstall the hoses if this works; if not, replace them.

If the hoses aren't clogged, the problem is probably a defective washer pump. Remove and replace with a new one. To remove, pull out the electrical plug, disconnect the water hoses and unbolt the pump from the car.

Install the new pump following the manufacturer's instructions.

A clean windshield is important to your safety behind the wheel. Take a few minutes to inspect your windshield washer system to see if it needs preventive maintenance. These simple precautions could prevent a serious accident.

Food Safety For The Holidays And All Year

BLACKSBURG -- Don't let the joyous holiday atmosphere interfere with food safety precautions, warned a Virginia Tech Extension specialist in food technology, F. William Cooler.

Food poisoning is a possibility and cooks always should take some simple precautions against it. Here are some common sense rules.

Do not purchase bulging, leaking, damaged cans at the market. Discard cracked jars or those with loose lids. Never use, or even taste, the contents of any food can that spurts liquid when opened. These are danger signs of possible contamination.

When shopping in the market, select meat, dairy products and frozen food last, and don't let them sit in a warm car while other errands are run. Return home quickly and put the food into the refrigerator as soon as possible to prevent growth of harmful bacteria.

Keep the refrigerator at 40 degrees Fahrenheit or below. Do not store fresh meats longer than five days in the refrigerator; cured whole hams and bacon will keep longer. About two days is the maximum that poultry, fish or ground meat should be refrigerated for best quality.

Refrigerate leftover foods immediately after eating or cooking. Leaving food at room temperature for more than two hours (including preparation time) allows bacteria to multiply rapidly. Don't let food cool below 45 degrees Fahrenheit before putting it into the refrigerator. Put it away immediately. Refrigerating hot foods does not cause them to spoil contrary to some "old wives tales."

Sometimes food can look good, taste good and even smell good, but still be contaminated and cause food-borne illness, the specialist cautioned.

Wash hands before cooking. Keep hands away from face and hair. Handle foods such as hot dogs and lunch meats with a kitchen utensil, not with fingers since hands carry more germs than a clean utensil.

Don't use the cooking utensil to taste food. For those cooks who must sample the food, Cooler recommended they use a clean eating utensil each time. Don't put the spoon used for tasting into the food again. Get a clean one for each taste.

Wash cooking utensils and surfaces thoroughly.

It is important to clean and sanitize pots, cutting boards and knives used for raw foods before using them for cooked foods. Don't store cooked foods close beside raw foods. This prevents cross-contamination between the two.

Keep pets out of the kitchen.

The Virginia Tech faculty member also listed some speeific suggestions about individual foods.

Cook and store giblets separately.

Stuffing fowl prolongs cooking time, but if the cook is determined to stuff the fowl, do so just before roasting. Be sure the stuffed fowl is cooked thoroughly. It must reach an internal temperature of 185 degree Fahrenheit. Use a thermometer.

Refrigerate stuffing and fowl in separate dishes.

Do not use dirty, cracked or soiled eggs in raw egg dishes such as eggnog.

'R' value that insulation usually provides, you can estimate what is needed," the Tech faculty member said.

The recommended "R" value for ceilings in Virginia is a minimum of 19 and a maximum of 35; for walls, the "R" value should be 11 to 22; while an "R" of 13 is suggested for floors.

Furnace Upkeep Retected In Bills

BLACKSBURG - One way to hold down heating costs this winter is to make certain the household furnace is properly maintained, a Virginia Tech faculty member advised.

Without attention, furnaces will have to work harder and use more fuel, William H. Mashburn, Virginia Tech Extension specialist in mechanical engineering, said.

"Heating systems should be given routine maintenance every year to keep them running efficiently," he added. "Ask a service representative to show you how to change the air filter. New filters should be checked once a month during the heating season," he said.

A service representative also can help check the system for additional items needing attention. For example, seal air leaks in the ductwork and insulate all ducts exposed to cold attics, crawl spaces or garages, Mashburn suggested.

Hot air ducts need up to six inches of insuation if exposed to outdoor temperatures, he said. But, make certain that insulating the ducts will not allow plumbing to freeze, since heat escaping from ducts and pipes often helps heat the basement. In homes with hot water or steam heat, all pipes in unheated areas should be well insulated.

Heating systems should be safe and suitable for individual home needs, the specialist said.

Before purchasing one of the several devices on the market to help save energy,he advised checking with a local Virginia Extension agent, utility company or reputable heating contractor.

"Some surge suppressors are being marketed to Virginia homeowners which are absolutely of no use in conserving energy," Mashburn warned.

The specialist advised extreme caution when fuel additives are being considered for use in conserving energy.
